Three Days of Darkness: Election Edition – How Dissidents Should View Election Fraud, AmNat Freakout and Count the Vote

Suggesting the election was rigged will in the future get you fired from your job.

I am currently writing at around midnight Saturday the 6th. There is still officially no clear winner, although given current trajectories, it is all but certain that Biden will be president. This is not surprising. However, there is question about voter fraud. If you have been following the election on twitter, you will notice that many people are running with the idea that the election is being stolen from Trump. More on Trump voters doing this in a later post. But it is odd to see dissidents doing this, especially given their criticisms of Trump.

It is clear that there is something fishy going on the election. I hate Trump but I also can understand the propensity for those in power to cheat. The narrative from those who hate Trump should not be that everything in this election is completely above board; it should be rather that Trump by being a big useless dork brought this cheating upon himself. This was the election to lose for Trump and he did just that. Is the idea that counting all the ballots voter fraud a joke? Yes. But we can hate Trump and still maintain that there is something fishy going on. Seeing the dissidents who haven't learned their lesson from 2016 and then jumped on the Trump train in 2020 freaking out now that Biden is winning is about as good as seeing Hillary voters freakout over Trump's 2016 win.

Here is the argument from Richard Spencer:

> We were winning, then they started counting absentee/early votes and we were losing. This must be fraud!
> This is not an argument.
> The GOP accurately discerned that early/absentee voting favored Biden, which is why they sought to delegitimize it (with the exception of states in which it might favor Republicans, like Florida). Why are the conservatives surprised when they start losing when the early/absentee votes come in? And when these votes are counted according to state laws? Why should anyone believe, absent of evidence, that this MUST BE FRAUD? Trump sucks, and more than half the country can't stand him. Democrats voted early and absentee, for a variety of reasons. This outcome simply isn't surprising.

And here's from Richard Houck:

> the correct take for the people who hate Trump shouldn't be "there was no election aberration because CNN told us so", after YEARS of bashing the mainstream media, that's absurd and inauthentic. the take SHOULD BE, "yeah he got cheated, lmao and i'm glad, ZioDON get fukt"idiots"haha yeah i might have spent my entire twitter career pointing out how CNN and the political machine is deeply corrupt, but this ONE TIME, it's all true guys, haha just COPE more". y'all some damn clowns
